Emergent literacy - comprises the essential skills, knowledge, and attitudes that prepare children for the formal reading and writing instruction they will encounter in kindergarten and first grade.

are the basic building blocks of learning to read and write

How do children acquire literacy skills? - Children acquire emergent literacy skills through their interactions with adults and their environments. While these skills begin to develop in early infancy, preschool programs provide powerful opportunities for young children who might not otherwise have the opportunity to master these essential building blocks that contribute to later success in school.

effective preschool programs can prepare all children for success in school and in becoming readers and writers, no matter their background? t/f - true what is the goal of this training? - to give you specific strategies and tools for preparing all children to experience early success in learning to read and write.

What are the three areas of emergent literacy skills that are related to later reading and writing achievement and are directly tied to how well children will be reading by the end of first grade? - oral language, print knowledge, and phonological awareness

Research shows that children starting kindergarten who are behind in essential emergent literacy skills are likely to stay behind throughout their school years. t/f - True

How can you extend children's language in a group setting? - One way is to improve whole group conversations by making sure children do most of the talking and that many children participate. Try to open a group conversation by suggesting a topic and pausing to listen to children's responses. You could try saying something like, "I noticed how foggy it was this morning on the way to school" and pausing to encourage children to respond to your comment. A comment encourages children to think and respond in a way that is different from responding to questions that require answers. As children contribute to the conversation, try saying things like, "Hmmm," or "That's interesting."
