INTRODUCTION TO MATLAB

OBJECTIVE:

The objectives of this lab session are to:

- (i) Become familiar with MATLAB environment
- (ii) Become familiar with Basic MATLAB commands
- (iii) Write small programs using MATLAB.

BACKGROUND:

MATLAB is a high level computer language used for the programming of complex engineering problems. MATLAB stands for MATRIX LABORATORY. As the name suggests, MATLAB a plethora of functions used for different operations on matrices, where a matrix can be scalar (single element), a vector (one dimensional) or an $n \times m$ Matrix (two dimensional).

In MATLAB we have many tool boxes each containing functions related to specific operations, just as we have libraries in JAVA or C language. Communications, Control System, Image processing and Image acquisition are some of the most commonly used tool boxes. MATLAB has extensive capabilities of two and three dimensional plotting. We will use these plotting facilities of MATLAB to aid in the physical interpretation of equations, particularly those related to fields and potentials.

In MATLAB, there are two modes of executing a program, the first one is command line execution and the second one is M-File or DOT M (.m) file execution. For command line execution commands are entered in the command window where (.m) file, complete program is first written in a file and saved with DOT M (.m) extension. The complete program is then RUN like any other programming language. We will use DOT M files throughout this lab.

BASIC TERMINOLOGY:

MATLAB has some basic terms and predefined variables you should get familiar with before going any further. One of these is the variable ans. When you type most commands to MATLAB, they will return values. You can assign these values to variables by typing in equations. For example, if you type

>>x = 5
```

MATLAB will print

```
x =
    5
```

And assign the number five to the variable x. MATLAB uses ans for any expression you don't assign to a variable. For instance, if you type

```
>> 5
```
