

WRITING UP YOUR ACTION RESEARCH PROJECT

Jean McNiff

Demonstrating methodological rigour

Demonstrating methodological rigour means showing that the research is systematic and coherent, and addresses all aspects of methodology, as follows.

Identify a research issue

You begin any research project by identifying a research issue. In social science research, it is set out in a highly formalised way, usually as a hypothesis. To be tested, a hypothesis takes the form of 'if... then...' and will typically be an action. For example, 'if I increase what would happen if...?' or 'how do I know I'm doing better?' or 'how do I know the quality of my work?' These questions are always contextualised, you give an account of the real-life social context of practice situations you are in.

Identify research aims and formulate a research question

All researchers state why they are doing the research, their reasons, and what they hope to achieve (their objectives). Action research questions are often a social situation from an identified problem. In social science researchers often ask 'what's going on?' and just describe the problem. They ask 'what are those factors that are causing this problem?' and 'what are those factors that are contributing to this problem?' and 'what can I do about it?' In action research, you are interested in the implications of practice, which includes self-reflection and a critical appraisal of practice, and the ways in which you and others
