Martin Vranken revisits a debate in labour law scholarship that has been raging for the past 15–20 years in Australia and internationally. Is traditional labour law, which focuses primarily on employee protection, under threat of becoming extinct because of the imperatives of a globalised economy? Vranken is a true believer, a traditionalist, and a labour law tragic in the most admirable sense. He discusses the divide between the purists or traditionalists such as himself and the pragmatists or 'the new generation labour lawyers'² who argue that labour law should be a tool for regulating the labour market. Vranken prefers the purists' or traditionalists' view, but has his eyes wide open. He acknowledges the pressure imposed on policy-makers by the globalised economy, as he repeats throughout the book, 'a social paradise cannot be built on an economic graveyard'. However his argument is that this pressure is all the more reason why labour law should not lose its 'raison d'être' of protecting employees, and become a mere facilitator of economic flexibility and subordinate to economic interests. Instead, policy-makers should strive to find the right balance between social and economic priorities without allowing one social interest in particular to be subordinate to the other. Employee and economic interests are both of equal importance. As
